JILI Fishing Cannon & Bankroll Guide

A fishing session spends a budget on a different clock — bet-per-bullet, fire rate and turnover, plainly.

A JILI fishing shooter spends a budget on a different clock from a slot: the wager is priced per bullet and your rate of fire sets the pace. This guide covers the practical side — how turnover builds, what fire rate really changes, and why a fish's multiplier is a payout conditional on a kill you cannot guarantee. It manages a session, it does not beat an edge. Reference material only, no real-money play involved.

01 Cost is per bullet

Every shot costs the bullet value you set, hit or miss. Session turnover is bullet value times shots fired, and because you can fire continuously, turnover builds far faster than a slot's spin-by-spin pace. A low bullet value can still generate enormous turnover.

02 Fire rate is a turnover dial

Firing faster, or using a rapid special cannon, does not improve the odds on any single shot. It only takes more priced shots per minute — more spend and a faster resolution. A slower rate stretches a modest budget across more of the session.

03 A multiplier is conditional

Each target shows the payout you get IF a shot kills it, paired with a hidden kill probability. High-value bosses are deliberately hard to drop per shot; small fish die quickly. That pairing is exactly how the game keeps its house edge.

04 Where control ends

You control which fish you target, the bullet value, and when to fire a special weapon. You do not control whether a given shot connects — that is drawn by the RNG against the target's kill probability. No aim converts a low kill chance into a landed shot.

05 The dry-run trap

A boss that has survived a hundred shots is not closer to dying; each shot is independent with no memory of misses. Chasing a stubborn boss is how a session's turnover quietly explodes. Try any fishing title in the free demo to feel the pace first.
